What is alienation? Alienation occurs when a person withdraws or isolates himself from his environment or other people. People with symptoms of alienation often reject their loved ones or society. They can also show feelings of distance and distance, including their own emotions. Alienation is a complex but common condition. This is both sociological and psychological, and can affect your health and worsen existing medical conditions. Treatment involves diagnosing the cause of alienation and following treatment. Read on to learn more about the symptoms, types and causes of alienation and what the next steps are. Feeling away from work, family and friends is a common symptom of alienation. Other symptoms include: feeling helpless as the world is empty or meaningless, excluded from conversations or events, different or separated from all those who have difficulty approaching and talking with others, especially parents feeling dangerous when interacting with others/refusing to obey the rules There may also be symptoms of depression that include : having a lack of appetite or eating too much, sleeping excessively or having insomnia fatigued/lacking feelings of alienation despair is a complex condition that affects many people. There are six common types. Alienation can have many causes, from psychological disorders to social situations. Health-related causes Alienation may be the result of a mental or physical condition. Possible causes of health-related alienation include: When alienation has health-related causes, there will typically be other symptoms that persist for more than a few days. Talk to a doctor if you are concerned about symptoms. Social Causes Social causes are generally defined by how you, or someone you know, feels disconnected from others, their environment or themselves. For example, a change in your environment, such as changing jobs or schools, can cause alienation. Employment-Related Causes Alienation at work occurs when a person feels distant from what they are producing in the workplace. This disconnection can cause dissatisfaction and a sense of alienation: the work they do their colleagues the environment themselves Causes in adolescent Alienation is common in adolescents. It can also be a side effect of: attachment to a parent or caregiver in early childhood big changes in their comfort zone of bullying or peer victimization grow as children grow up, they may begin to distrust adults or the values they have been raised with. Teenagers can feel isolated from their parents, teachers and peers. They may feel anxious about their social skills or physical appearance. Teenagers may even feel isolated from their own identity. This can happen as they discover themselves and think about their future. Alienation in adolescents is considered a symptom only if it accompanies other disorders, such as a phobia or personality disorder. Parental Causes Parental alienation is a term that negative and alienating behaviours displayed by a parent, such as not being present. Parental alienation syndrome describes a psychiatric disorder in children, particularly in the context of divorce. Sometimes this may explain a child's refusal to visit a parent. The rejection of a parent has multiple factors. These may be interactions between parents and feelings of vulnerability on the part of the child. It is not the same alienation that a child may feel towards a parent who is abusive, especially if the child becomes involved with that parent as an adult. To treat alienation, the cause must be identified. People who experience psychological pain as a result of alienation may benefit from seeing a mental health professional. Gaining a sense of empowerment can also help a person fight alienation. For teenagers, a sense of purpose is an asset. But the search for this goal can induce stress. Researchers suggest that parental support may help adolescents who experience alienation due to feelings of worthlessness. Research also shows that a strong parent-child relationship can help a child cope with bullying. This is another possible cause of alienation during childhood. Feeling alienated can lead to many different social problems that include: drug or alcohol abuse activity/poor school activity/poor or performance at work Alienation can also increase the symptoms of mental and physical disorders that may include: psychological pain, including anger and the effects of drug health depression or alcohol abuse disorders attempted suicide alienation can increase feelings of helplessness and alienation , it is important to talk to someone, especially if you have recently had thoughts of suicide. Seek help or advice from a mental health professional if you are concerned about alienation. Alienation can be a symptom of an underlying cause. Sometimes it can be a side effect of a new experience or environment and will pass over time. It can also help open up other avenues of support. Talk to your friends and family. You can also show your support for someone you know by reaching out and spending time with them. In the event of parental alienation, your next steps may involve counselling.
